Every PhD student begins by acknowledging her gratitude and debt to her supervisor and I will continue with the tradition; only, in my case, my gratitude would extend to subjects beyond the scope of this dissertation. Among all the generous gifts that I have received from Professor G. N. Ray, I must mention one that I value over others – his patience with a moody doctoral student like me.

I would also like to acknowledge my gratitude to two of my professors, Professor K. K. Roy (University of North Bengal) and Professor Abhijit Mazumdar (Siliguri College of Science and Arts), the first from whom I learnt to ‘read’ the novel and the latter who, much earlier, had taught me the virtues of close reading. I am also grateful to Professor A. K. Singh (Vice-Chancellor, Dr. Babasaheb Ambedkar Open University, Ahmedabad), for encouragement, affection, and unconditional support, always; for never saying ‘no’.

I’m grateful to Sukanya, Ananya and Nilanjana for their gifts of friendship and forgiveness in equal measure, for letting me be their friend in spite of my truant and forgetful ways during the period in which this dissertation was written; to Aaron and Diana, for the never-ending discussions and long walks and late dinners in Germany; to my cousins, Mitti and Troy, for keeping me sane by refusing to let me grow up; to Aarti, Santona and Sapna for the temporary oases of comfort; and to my brother and father-in-law, the props in my conscience during my numerous runaway moods.

This PhD would never have been written had it not been for a few people. I’m grateful to Amit Chaudhuri, the writer, the musician and the person, for every word, in the text and outside it; to my parents, who made me look at the sky when they taught me my first nursery rhyme, “... Like a diamond in the sky”; and to Ranjan, for everything, every time.
