Government budgeting and fiscal policy is one of the most exciting areas of political economy today. In recent years, fiscal systems throughout the world have been severely strained as governments have assumed more and more responsibilities for economic management, especially in the developing countries like Bangladesh where needs are the greatest and resources, the scarcest.

My interest in this area was initiated by Dr. Jagañish Chandra Debnath, Professor and Head of the Department of Economics, North Bengal University, my academic supervisor, philosopher and friend, who suggested this topic. Now, it is an opportunity to express my deepest gratitude to him without whose valuable guidance, suggestions and constant encouragement this study would not have been possible. I am equally indebted to Mrs. Debnath and their beloved daughters Bipasha and Bidisha for their priceless encouragement.

I acknowledge my debt to the Indian Council for Cultural Relations, Government of India, for granting me a scholarship during the period of my study in India. At the same time I am indebted to the Ministry of Education, Government of Bangladesh, for providing me a study leave for three years. I am also grateful to all of my colleagues especially to Professor Hasan Waiz, Principal, and to my students of M.C. College, Sylhet, Bangladesh who were the source of inspiration to me.

Needless to say, I have been immensely benefitted by the valuable suggestion from the faculty members of the Department of Economics, North Bengal University to whom I express my sincere gratitude. I also thank the office staff and students of the Department for their kind co-operation and help.

In the preparation of this study I collected data and materials from different libraries of Bangladesh and India. Of these, special mention may be made of the libraries of the Secretariat, Planning Academy, BIDS, National Bureau of Revenue, ERD and Management Centre — all in Dhaka and of the Secretariat Library, National Library and British Council Library — all in Calcutta as well as of the North Bengal University Library. I am thankful for the courtesy and assistance shown by the staff of these libraries. I am also grateful to the various authors and publishers whose publications I have liberally used.

I take this opportunity to acknowledge indebtedness to my wife Sajeda Khanom and children whose patience and sacrifice had always been a source of continuous inspiration to me during the last few years when I spent extended hours doing nothing else but my own professional work. Finally, I am grateful to my parents for their unstinting encouragement and emotional sustenance without whose interest, support and urging my career could not have taken this shape. I feel very proud in dedicating this study to them.
